A: The only safe, and authoritative way to check if video is encoded with H.264 or H.265 (or HEVC for that matter) is by examining the file's file signature (see File Signature Properties for this) — which is, of course, something that can only be done by software. So how is this done in your instance? The H.264/HEVC installer decodes the video and creates a file in the same format as the video, plus some extra stuff (profile/level information stored in the file's file signature). Unless that download provides the software/setting (more likely in the Windows world than the Linux world) to extract this file signature information from the video file itself, there's no reliable means to check it for H.264/HEVC. (Note that normally this is usually done automatically by software, but sometimes it is not.

H.264/HEVC software may or may not tell you if the video in question is H.264/HEVC.) [IMAGE] [IMAGE]
