keygen. ddsQ: Why does gasping for breath sometimes precede a voice? When I'm anxious or feel stressed, sometimes I find myself gasping for breath just as if I were trying to inhale. When I have a short breathing session like this and come out of it, I don't have any vocal cords feeling, neither can I produce any sounds. But after a short period of time, I can find myself producing sound. Is there any physiological explanation for this? A: You are simply breathing faster than your rate of vocal cord opening and closing. There is no real physiological basis for this. When you say 'find yourself producing sound' I guess that's because your lungs and vocal cords are more capable of producing sound, in response to the faster inhalation, and so there's not need to open and close the vocal cords any more, which is why you are not producing sound at that time. If you are trying to gasp (which is regular breathing that is shallower than a normal breath) and you are producing sound, then this is the result of pneumatic pressure (when you exhale, the air gets pushed out of your lungs) compressing your vocal cords. If you are trying to inhale, the air is sucked into your lungs, filling them with air, and at the same time the pressure is lifted in the lungs. That pneumatic pressure compresses your vocal cords and the air flow through them. As you inhale more, you get more air in your lungs and the vocal cords are lifted more and more, until you arrive at the point at which they can't be lifted any more, so you stop. If you are trying to exhale, you exhale, more air gets pushed out of your lungs, and at the same time the pressure drops, the vocal cords start relaxing, and you stop. vrije taal.
