Stability of atorvastatin calcium in aqueous medium. The purpose of the study was to characterize the physicochemical stability of atorvastatin calcium (ATV) in aqueous medium. Stability of ATV was evaluated by establishing kinetic profiles of pharmacologically active and inactive metabolites at different pH conditions. Differential scanning calorimetry (DSC), Raman spectroscopy, X-ray powder diffraction and Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) were used to assess the physicochemical changes that occur after lyophilization and in aqueous medium, and to identify any phase transformations that could be associated with physicochemical changes. The results indicate that there are no major alterations in the drug's chemical structure on storage at different pH values. In contrast, the enthalpy and entropy variation at pH 1.2 and 3.0 are indicative of drug decomposition and this variation is more significant for active metabolites than for inactive metabolites.
