Benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) is a common condition which often presents with urinary frequency, nocturia, decreased quality of life and maybe signs and symptoms of bladder instability and incontinence. One of the best known methods of treating this condition is transurethral resection of the prostate (TURP). In recent years, benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) has been increasingly recognised as a significant health problem amongst middle-aged and older men. Men with severe symptoms are often treated with transurethral resection of the prostate (TURP). The increased use of TURP has raised questions regarding the long term results of the procedure. In recent years less invasive treatments for patients with prostatic obstruction have been developed. These include procedures using balloons or probes, and laser treatment. Randomised trials have shown that the efficacy of transurethral surgery for the treatment of benign prostatic hyperplasia is high, and that it is the current "
